About The Artist

Alja Horvat is a young illustrator based in Slovenia, where she also grew up. She is currently finishing her degree at University of Natural Sciences and Engineering in Ljubljana. Art has always been a passion of hers, and she decided to take it more seriously in 2018.

She mainly works with her Wacom Intous graphic tablet, but she also loves traditional painting with oils. She is inspired by everything that surrounds her, mostly by nature and museums. Being a big fan of 60s, 70s and 80s we can feel the nostalgia in her illustrations.

Alja Horvat is also a part of Forbes 30 Under 30 Art & Culture 2020 and she also received an Elle Style Fashion Award for Young Talent in 2019.

Meet The Drobe: A Smart Fashion Purchase For Now & Later

AMANDA RANDONE
LAST UPDATED MARCH 31, 2020, 12:33 AM

Here's a theory: there are two types of people when it comes to how we work from home. There's the type that's up early, teeth brushed, and pants (yes, actual pants!) on before the caffeine hits. Then there's the rest of us: those who only change out of our comfy pajamas when there's a Zoom meeting on the calendar. Even though we're all about the lazy excellence of a matching sweatsuit, we've found ourselves shifting our fashion focus to another article of minimum-effort attire that'll actually appeal to both sets of WFH-ers.

Introducing the drobe — a name (that we just made up, TBH) for a garment with big potential. It's a robe-type piece that's perfectly suited for the indoors but can double as a dress if and when you need it to. Think Zsa Zsa Gabor levels of glam but Snuggie levels of comfort. But we're not talking about fluffy bathrobes here (although that's one piece of loungewear everyone can get behind). Think more of the flowy type that cascades into the perfect silhouette when fastened at the waist. If your robe's got enough coverage along with a motif that deserves to be appreciated, go ahead and add a pair of chunky mules to the ensemble and call it a dress. You may be concerned about a more secure closure for outdoor wear, but that's nothing a slip, tank, or a little dab of fabric tape can't fix. The look is sleek, simple, and easy-to-wear for clocking in that couch time, joining friends for a cyber cocktail, and then joining them IRL when the time finally comes.

Jiggy Puzzles: Boating With Flowers
I used to think puzzles were such until I was gifted one from Jiggy Puzzles. The puzzles are challenging — but in the best way — and you can already imagine hours flying by once you're in a groove. The category is Boating With Flowers, and I like how each puzzle supports women artists. Plus, it comes with materials to frame the puzzle once it's done, so you can hold on to your mini artwork for longer than a 24-hour Instagram Stories post. I currently have my eye on this two-piece tropical scene, Boating With Flowers by Alja Horvat, who is a 22-year-old illustrator from Slovenia. I can already see it perched on my windowsill. —T.A.

Nostalgia in the Garden Face Mask by Alja Horvat ($13.59, originally $16.99; society6.com)

Nostalgia in the Garden Face Mask by Alja Horvat

If you do have access to a washer and dryer, a fabric mask is always a good idea too. Society6 just launched more than 3,000 masks on its site, all of which are covered in art from independent artists. Best of all: A portion of all proceeds go to World Central Kitchen's coronavirus relief efforts.

Don't go off the beaten path

While part of the joy of exploring Mother Nature is seeing new and beautiful views, if your road trip includes a hike, stay on the marked path. Particularly now, when a jaunt to the emergency room with a fractured ankle could put you at risk for more severe problems, podiatrist Dr. Valerie Polinsky suggests following the course.

"Avoid the temptation to hike off trail and in unfamiliar or unmarked areas," he warns. "You could get lost, injured or both."
