Analysis of William Blake's Poem

London

William Blake's William Black Poetry An analysis of London London is a poem characterized by its dark and distinguished tone. This is a glimpse of the period of war and poverty in the history of the UK (especially London) and the talker experienced this history as he walks across the street. Through personification, it provides a great human aspect to the narrator's thoughts and beliefs. The author uses a rhyming scheme that reflects walking speed. Using an octave, the speed is moderate, each accented syllable resembles all steps of the narrator, so write my essay.

Through a comparison course between William Wordsworth and William Black's London Westminster Bridge, I called William Wordsworth Wordsworth and William Black Black. Both Wordsworth and Black's poems are about London, but Wordsworth's poem was written when he came to London while Black lived in London. Wordsworth's poem is about gorgeous costumes in London, he can see this, he wrote in the first line; "There is nothing on Earth that can act more fairly:" Praise, he likes London, but we are told that he is looking at London with that bad perspective.

William Black's appreciation for London The first section of London's poem begins with a black image and he squats with "each Chartered Street". Black chose the term "charter" to convey various images in the reader's mind. The direct image that audiences can imagine is that London streets are drawn. But after further consideration, the reader can confirm that Black has a different meaning to that word. The term "charter" is also a document that gives certain rights to the town.
