Most students live off campus in either market-rate housing or purpose-built student-housing facilities. Rental occupancies in the student-housing and multifamily segments are currently very high, supported by solid enrollment growth in recent years. Enrollment growth in 2017–18 and 2018–19 has been supportive of occupancies, with growth rates above 3.5% for both years. The options for student housing have grown considerably during the past decade, quadrupling to the current inventory of over 8,000 market-rate multifamily units in the immediate vicinity. Student-housing assets near campus can garner very strong pricing; top-tier properties can achieve cap rates near 4%, demonstrated by recent sales.

MARKET OVERVIEW

SOUTH CENTRAL UNIVERSITY PARK MID-CITIES

In the 1930s and especially the '40s, South Central Avenue was the center of West Coast Jazz. At the time, even superstars like Duke Ellington who played around Los Angeles still had to stay in South Central. Although the most famous, the Dunbar, was located in South Park, there were numerous other jazz and blues clubs on South Central. After the restrictive housing codes were abolished, this Harlem of the West dissipated as the population dispersed, jazz declined in popularity, and the neighborhood fell into disrepair.

Nowadays South Central is 87% Latino (mostly Mexican and Salvadoran), 10% black, 1% white and 1% Asian. It's one of the more urbanized areas of the Eastside and, depending on where one draws the dividing line between Downtown and South Central (e.g. the 10 Freeway or W Washington Boulevard), its home to most of the iconic buildings in the region including Allied Architects Association's Bob Hope Patriotic Hall, the 13-story LA Mart, and the 14-story Art Deco 155 West Washington Boulevard building, built in 1927.
