Searching for a
Miracle

I hope you guys are having an amazing morning. It's a rainy day here in North Carolina, but that sleep I got was amazing because of it! No matter what the situation may be, there's always some good in it somewhere.

So let me tell y'all a quick story about me. I don't watch television. If you know me, you know that. Well the other day I went out to eat at Moe & D's in Rocky Mount (a very awesome black-owned restaurant, might I add and plug), and I looked up at the tv screen and discovered that there was a lot of flooding in California due to mudslides. Immediately, my heart and prayers went out to everyone affected by such a disastrous situation.

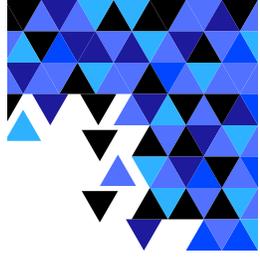

Last night, I was wrapping up some work, and I went on one of our local news sites to do some research. When I got there, I saw an article headlined, "Rescuers 'searching for a miracle' in California mudslides" I can't begin to tell you how that sent chills all over me. Searching for a miracle. Actively looking for it. Relentlessly pursuing it. Not sitting around and waiting to see if any bodies float up. Not standing on rooftops praying all day. SEARCHING for a MIRACLE.

That one headline shifted my mind. We are so passive sometimes. There is an awesome couple that is having a word and worship crusade tonight (shoutout to Jeremy and Chaurita Dawson-Herring). Yesterday, I posted their flyer on my Instagram and I captioned it, "I'm looking for a miracle". But am I really? Am I actively looking for something miraculous to happen in my life, or am I just sitting back hoping something good happens in my life? There is most definitely a difference.

As I read the new article, I saw that the situation was bleak. The chances of survival were becoming slimmer and slimmer. However, none of that stopped rescue workers from searching for a miracle - and nothing in your life should stop you. NOTHING.
